

I suppose that the concept of beauty is an human beauty, and that the early hominins had the concept of beauty without tools or artistic works, so that the beauty was not built but inherent in an image.

I suppose that the children of the early hominins had the concept of beauty (and the concept of good and bad), like a beautiful smile of a girl (that must be perfect, balanced, because of little difference can give irony or grimace); that is a promise, and absence of problems.

So that each beautiful object give us a picture with a promise of no problem, a simpler life, an understanding of the Nature.

If this is true, if there is a definition of beauty, then it is possible to obtain beauty by human actions (for example legislation, math formulas, human behavior, architecture, writing, design).
