The Sun Never Sets

[Author: Miguel A. Sanchez-Rey]
The sun never sets is the motto of a far away nation-state at the dawn of the Scientific Age. It’s scattered across different continents and it’s besieged by a neo-colonial nation whom decline has been ongoing since the end of the Second World War. A neo-colonial nation that prides itself as a nation of immigrants, that values itself in it’s freedom of speech, and revels in it’s tolerance of race and ideological opinion. Yet its economic and military policies have revealed the U.S. to be far-right in comparison to other developed countries that has since then refused to partake in the dominance of free-markets, the rise of a service base economy, and the willingness to reward private interest while slashing domestic spending and encouraging the radicalization of the political spectrum.

It’s an undiscovered country that has become a nation of cult-leadership and flaw policy making. A country that has gone its separate ways and establish itself as a model country of savage cuts to public spending, poor health-care and stagnate wages. It has failed to live up to standards when it comes to education as the European states or even measure up to the infrastructure of Hong Kong. It has since then revealed itself to be nation-state on the verge of authoritarianism as war-like and free-market policies take over the American landscape. It has revealed a deeply divided and paranoid nation that expresses fundamental religious divisions and class indifferences. Only then has the undiscovered country been besieged by enormous anger and hate with the political establishment profoundly divided.

The U.S. has become a cult. A cult-following has ensued across different party lines. Where leadership must follow orders from the private sector. But let’s be exact. The U.S. was, in many different respects, bound to detach itself from the constitutional order that laid the groundwork for the Federalist policies of the early American founding figures. Since then the constitutional order has become more inert. With each accumulating decade the U.S. Constitution became more irrelevant to social progress. Social progress that is both cognizant of international necessity of human and economic rights. The U.S. nevertheless has become victim to private markets. Where rewarding the private sector became the U.S. national norm. Compromising the achievements of the 1960’s New Left and the civil rights era.

Other countries have pursued policies which are more open to social progress; that though seemingly populace, has favor public social spending to pacify the civilian population. But as well has remained independently self-governing but detach from the demands of the American leadership.

The far-away nation, in which the sun never sets, has seen the transition from classical imperialism to a scattered nation across different continents. A nation independently self-governing but united in its core ideal of a common interest. A common interest that can be said to be the internationalist model. The internationalist model that is antagonist to suppression and domination but more incline to pursue mutual economic trade and through its military alliance across the different continents they shield themselves from any external threat to its independence and longevity. That is, the sun never sets on the Common Wealth of Nations.
Only then has American society seen itself more beleaguered by national strife. It has seen itself more on the verge of being divided states with separate economic motives that is detach from the federalist commitment to the House of Congress and the Executive Office. It has use its militaristic policies to implement a suppressive military industrial complex that wagers battle grounds and animosity. The U.S. being a surrounded nation, has since then witness the setting of the sun across the different regional states.

Only time will tell when the U.S. succumbs to third world policies. Where much of the planet, besides the U.S., pursues the internationalist norm of self-governance and a military alliance that stresses common economic interest.

The U.S. is a defiant nation but also fooled by a flaw constitutional order. A constitutional order that has not been able to adapt to modernization and social progress. Subjecting the U.S. to unreasonable policy decision making while its war-like policies has crippled the U.S. capacity to sustain a vibrant military alliance. The disenchantment with the United States growing protectionist movement has rendered the U.S. incapable to manage world-affairs. U.S. decline becomes imminent and ominous. With national animosity more apparent to the United States economic and political establishment.
