Delirium of the American Presidency

The Leading Professor Miguel Angel Sanchez-Rey [The Grandmaster, The Master of Space-Time]

The Academy of Advance Science and the Technological Sciences
There is no telling what the American presidency may mean after the New York Times aftershock editorial of regicide in the White House. Or yet can anyone suppose that former president Barack Obama’s, belief in the transformative moment is anything but an affirmation of a fraudulent presidency in which the corporate sector has taking over the reigns of American political power. There can be no denying -- even then, of a clear and present danger evident in the former Vice President Joe Biden’s assertion of a renewal of the American spirit, when the U.S. is becoming more of a declining union of states (on the edge of separating from the NATO alliance).

Yet Obama’s belief in the benevolence of it, is all telling. For it, is not a shared entity but a possessive entity. And to embody, “it” is to embody a false persona of horror and excitement -- but yet, harmless and benign in its very characteristic and nature. For that persona can be seen in a debating House of Congress or in President Donald Trump’s support for far-right wing interests (that are counter to the long-term goals of the corporate sector) but exhibit no immediate difference to American constitutional politics.

The U.S. crumbling state infrastructure cannot explain the need for massive U.S. military spending. 10 years of U.S. culture decision making has made the American presidency a haven for corporate pensions and dividends. And yet wages have been relatively stagnant -- since the end of the Bretton Woods Foundation, and workers’ rights have been curtailed by the money managers of American corporate capitalism.

While contemporary free trade agreements continue to spur massive growth in employment and productivity. Yet recurring trade disputes make such agreements suspect to ultranationalist sentiment. Inciting U.S. isolationism and indifference to international political and corporate interests. But even then U.S. hegemony remains a key part of its military strategy.

The delirium of the American presidency has been noticeable. What seems as a fanciful posture to invigorate American politics -- is instead, an attempt to revitalize political norms that were place to protect corporate and state power structures that are no longer of any meaningful justification.

The American presidency may seem altruistic and cohesive in its composure. But with varying self-interests, the American presidency makes pragmatic policy-making a demented and delirious enterprise.
Pragmatic policy-making that is the product of atypical decision-making that becomes counter-productive to U.S. long-term strategic and financial interests. But in which such atypical decision-making may manifest itself as corporate short-term gains in U.S. policy-decision making.

Hence solidifying the corporate governorship in return for more executive privilege and power. Igniting a power struggle between varying self-interests -- within the political establishment, in an attempt to shape U.S. politics and its global implications.
A delirious turning point in modern American political history. But in which ultra-nationalist sentiment has eluded to both an irreversible and atypical coup in ideology and praxis. The permanently declining religious state has become a majority consensus not only in contemporary radicalism but in global politics.