On the Subject of War Theory

Theoretical warfare stipulates the destruction of the war machine implies the implementation of war theory, i.e., war game theory is an important aspect of war planning and/or war strategy, involving logistical warfare, ground warfare, aerial warfare, naval warfare, and space warfare. Includes counter and/or retaliatory acts of conflict: cyberwarfare, organized terrorism, civil conflict, bioterrorism, civilian retaliation, supremacy, and/or violent crime.

War theory means that the ultimate strategy is the winning strategy, otherwise stalemate and/or Nash equilibrium -- no beneficial outlook.

Greetings Professor Falken:

Hello. A Strange Game. The only winning move is not to play. How about a nice game of chess?

All of wargame theory ends with an object to an endgame. When that object is achieved, and/or found, then it is neither stalemate nor defeat that defines the dominant player. Rather it’s the commanding [officers] outlook on post-historical warfare.

Whether it is General George S. Patton’s anticipation of Nazi defeat during the invasion of North French Africa; Abraham Lincoln overlooking the surrender of the confederate’s supremacists’ southern American forces; or Ward Churchill’s modernist outlook of post Second World War, Germany.

Pacifism is an ideal and not a factual nature of war theory. Instead, war theory states that to achieve pacification is to actualize conflictual self-interests -- to the extent, that competing self-interests achieve mutual cooperation based on mutual exchange and reciprocation. Only then, will a warring nation (and/or state) achieve peace-time, i.e., amongst themselves or even foreign groups:

Mutual pacification is the ideal outlook of the winning strategist, otherwise continual warfare is an unfortunate factuality of an atypical decision-maker.

Whereby, extreme tactics are counter to the notion of war theory, i.e., opposing tactics lead to the escalation of warfare to the extremity of war-crime (or unforeseeable catastrophe).

Such that, extremism is seen as a fringe aftermath of the war machine; war theory has toppled not only the war machine but radical extremism -- including its political ideology.
